From Midwest flooding to West Coast wildfires, natural disasters are putting stress on budgets at all levels of government. While states play a vital role in paying for disasters, research by The Pew Charitable Trusts shows that many would benefit from integrating more comprehensive tracking of disaster spending across agencies and phases. With the federal government looking to manage its rising costs in ways that could affect states, detailing spending on response, recovery, mitigation, and preparedness is more important than ever.

On this webinar, Laura Adcock from Ohio's Emergency Management Agency will discuss how her agency worked with Ohio's budget office to improve tracking of interagency disaster spending by establishing a new statewide policy. In addition, Pew will share findings from its research on state spending in an era of more frequent, severe, and expensive disasters.
