Building Alliances for Equitable Resilience

This resource supports hazard mitigation for the whole community

The Resilient Nation Partnership Network, with support from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, is pleased to release "Building Alliances for Equitable Resilience."

With this resource FEMA and its partners seek to increase awareness, commitments, and action in ways that will help make equitable resilience possible for all.

Co-created with 26 partners working in the fields of equity and resilience, readers will find guidance, perspectives, personal stories, resources and more.

One of many examples of helpful tools showcased within this resource is the "Guide to Expanding Mitigation – Making the Connection to Equity." It explains how community members and elected officials, emergency managers, community-based organizations, tribal representatives, and others can work together to strive for equity in hazard mitigation, including during the planning and project development process. This guide helps initiate conversations about mitigation investments that make communities both more equitable and more resilient; and reduces the likelihood of there being situations in which risk reduction measures displace the very people they are intended to protect.
